If you zoom-in on this close-up of the prison camp, where Antonio Dattorro was held captive during WWII, you will see individual prisoners walking about. The superimposed arrow points to a structure used to burn the dead, a daily occurrence. One of my father’s vivid recollections is finding himself lain on that pyre when he was presumed dead after having fallen into coma.